Is playing sports a purely physical aspect of life? Has it something to do with our intellectual pursuit or spiritual drives? Conventionally speaking, sports are primarily required to keep our body fit, muscles strong, and our human frame slim. Therefore, associating any intellectual or spiritual pursuit hidden in a sporting endeavor seems to be too far-fetched and idealistic.

A deeper look into the numerous advantages of sports helps us see their roles far beyond physical boundaries. Of course sports keep us fit but not just that. They do much more for us. Playing sports on a regular basis helps us feel light not just in body but also in mind. It helps us improve our focus and concentration. Since while playing we need to be competitive, it renews and reinforces our strength to confront the challenges of life. Hence indulging in the sporting feast on a regular basis gives us mental toughness and induces in us a spirit of courage. Not only that the need to remain focused on a task while playing makes us stick to the present. Therefore, the regret of our past actions and worry about future challenges do not normally bother a sportsperson. While playing one develops a meditative state of mind which keeps us stable, strong, and satisfied with whatever we have achieved.

Therefore, viewing sports just as a physical activity is just suggestive of our limited our limited understanding of their relevance in our life. In fact, on an age characterized by competitiveness, anxiety and loneliness sports acquires monumental significance as they keep our spirit soaring and soul replenished with zeal, enthusiasm, positivity and equilibrium. If such are not the pursuit of intellectual and spiritual drives, what are they?

- a. What is the main idea in this passage?
- b. What is the typical role of sports in human life?
- c. Why would a true sportsman not bother about past actions and future challenges?
